Each May, my mother and I peeled individual sticks into the ground, and then a week later we placed the newly planted sticks in the ground, replacing the blooms and immediately starting over. By the end of the season, we had a whole crop of beautiful flowers. It would have been impossible then to imagine how great the results would have been in the field.

My favorite memory of our garden is how it seemed to come alive. It was like magic, and even though it looked like nothing, it really was. The buttercups grew in the middle. They look so much like the flowers in the picture, you can see how they could be confused at first. I remember how much I enjoyed looking at them every day.

My mother believed in doing everything. She knew how to stitch together the seams of the barn on a sunny day. It was just a matter of time before she understood the importance of planning ahead. I believe that if we had followed her advice, we would have done things differently, but it would have been worth it.

In fact, we had already decided to do things differently. We had decided that the garden should be a place of light and creativity. We wanted it to be a place where we could come together and create something beautiful. We wanted it to be a place where we could find peace and quiet.

I think it's important to remember that life is not always easy. Sometimes it can be hard to find the light in the darkness. But if we keep working and trying, we can find the beauty in everything.

Expanding into All the World

Under the leadership of Joe J. Choo, missionaries and Paul E. T. Maxwell and others, global Church educational programs were initiated in the 1970s. A program was started to reach and adaptability in students outside the United States. In South America, students were taught in their own language and in South Africa, where churches it happened in such a rapid window of time that in four or five years, almost the entire world was ready for a mission. This secondary schools under C. S. C. supervision, a new person in the Church who is a member of the Church, had been
